The Second Language Acquisition PhD program is an interdisciplinary graduate degree program which started in 2000. It is sponsored by Foreign Language Acquisition Research and Education (FLARE), which is administered by international programs. Its academic home is in the Graduate College. The 77% PhD completion is very good and the median TTD of 6.3 yrs is slightly too long. 7 of the 15 graduates of the program to date have obtained tenure track faculty positions, 6 are in non-tenure track faculty positions and 2 are in other positions (language technology specialist, Chinese teacher at secondary level). Challenges identified by the program are to establish a stable funding base for graduate students and to recruit additional faculty to the program. The relationship of this graduate program to the CLAS language departments, in which some restructuring may be on the horizon, should be explored; however, the Task Force recognizes the unique interdisciplinary aspects of this program that should be maintained.
